You can read more about the incident on BBC News: BBC News Media captionRetired nurse Fiona Bracewell was stripped and had to use a chamber pot on a shop floor But staff said Mrs Bracewell said she had no memory of how she managed to get there - because she had been drinking the night before. Witnesses at the scene, a popular nightspot on Queensway, called police at 10:50 BST. A crime scene was taped off the bar and officers were called to Clearbrook Court. Mrs Bracewell, who had a blood alcohol level of 0.26, was taken to hospital with severe head injuries. image copyright Google image caption Police taped off Clearbrook Court after Mrs Bracewell was discovered on the shop floor She died at 17:50 BST. An inquest at Westminster Coroner's Court heard that doctors at the London Ambulance Service had written off her life because her blood alcohol level was too high to save her. 'Stupid' Prosecutor Emma Smith told the inquest: "When the ambulance arrived and the paramedics assessed the patient, they determined the cause of death as blunt force trauma to the head. "The cause of death was consistent with her having been pushed from a height by an unknown assailant and landing on her head." But she said officers could not say with certainty that the alcohol had been a factor. Det Ch Insp Liz Burns said: "When Fiona was discovered, she was lying on the shop floor, partially clothed and inappropriately dressed. "She was clearly unconscious but she did not appear to be dying. "The door was slightly ajar, as if she was getting dressed. "She had been drinking heavily that evening and when she was taken to hospital, 82157476af
